

Student Travel

From Elementary School through High School student travel is an enriching and important part of the educational experience. Student trips allow eager young minds to see beyond their towns, cities, and classrooms, and discover what lies outside of their everyday lives. Plus, student travel is fun and rewarding!

The opportunity for students to travel broadens their minds by giving them an awareness and understanding of other peoples and other cultures. It also shows them that students throughout the world have similar goals and expectations regarding their education. We all wish to grow, learn, and become the best we can be in whatever field we choose. Also, these student travel memories will be shared after each tour with fellow classmates and teachers, providing a more cohesive learning environment once students return to their Schools.

A child who is learning about animals might travel to Georgia Aquarium or the Riverbanks Zoo. High School and Middle School Bands, Choirs, and Orchestras who venture to perform anywhere from National Monuments to Disney World will never forget those memories that will shape them throughout their adult lives.

In addition to reading about historical documents in a classroom, why not visit the National Archives Museum in Washington, D.C.? Books and charts come to life when you can see the Constitution or the Declaration of Independence in person. Famous names such as John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr. become real when standing in the Presidential Library in Boston or Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta.

Students dreaming of a life in show business might get a taste of the bright lights of Broadway in New York City. A teenager who has grown up in a small town or rural area might never know what it is like to travel on a luxury motorcoach or see bustling streets packed with people and cars if it were not for traveling with their School to a busy city. Responsibility, time management, and appreciation of cultural diversity are just a few of the many lessons that can be learned through student travel. A child or young adult who travels throughout their school years will gain memories and experiences which will last a lifetime.
